it knew how to cover his body-cave so that foe’s grip might not harm his heart, or grasp of angry enemy his life. But the bright helmet guarded his head, one which was to stir up the lake-bottom, seek out the troubled water—made rich with gold, surrounded with splendid bands, as the weapon-smith had made it in far-off days, fashioned it wonderfully, set it about with hoar-images so that thereafter no sword or battle-blade might bite into it. And of his strong supports that was not the least which Hrothgar’s spokesman lent to his need: Hunting was the name of the hilted sword; it was one of the oldest of ancient treasures; its edge was iron, decorated with poison-stripes, hardened with battle-sweat. Never had it failed in war any man of those who grasped it in their hands, who dared enter on dangerous enterprises, onto the common meeting place of foes: this was not the first time that it should go work of courage.

Surely the son of Ecgflaf, great of strength, did not have in mind what, drunk with wine, he had spoken, when he lent that weapon to a better sword-fighter. He did not himself dare to risk his life under the warring waves, to engage his courage: there he lost his glory, his name for valor. It was not so with the other when he had armed himself for battle.

[Beowulf Attacks Grendel’s Mother]

(XXII) Beowulf spoke, the son of Ecgflaf, “Think now, renowned son of Healfdene, wise king, now that I am ready for the venture, gold-friend of warriors, of what we said before, that, if at your need I should go from life, you would always be in a father’s place for me when I am gone: be guardian of my young retainers, my companions, if battle should take me. The treasure you gave me, beloved Hrothgar, send to Hygelac. The lord of the Geats may know from the gold, the son of Hrethel may see when he looks on that wealth, that I found a ring-giver good in his gifts, enjoyed him while I might. And let Unferth have the old heirloom, the wide-known man my splendid-waved sword, hard edged: with Hunting I shall get glory, or death will take me.”

After these words the man of the War-Geats turned away boldly, would wait for no answer; the surging water took the warrior. Then was it a part of a day before he might see the bottom’s floor. Straightway that which had held the flood’s tract a hundred halfyears, ravenous for prey, grim and greedy, saw that some man from above was exploring the dwelling of monsters. Then she grooped toward him, took the warrior in her awful grip. Yet not the more for that she hurt his holy body within: his ring-armour shielded him about on the outside so that she could not pierce the wardress, the linked body-mail, with hateful fingers. Then as she came to the bottom the sea-wolf here the ring-prince to her house so that—no matter how brave he was—he might not wield weapons but many monsters attacked him in the water, many a sea-beast tore at his mail-shirt with war-torses, strange creatures affrighted him. Then the earl saw that he was in some hostile hall where to water turned him at all, and the flood’s onrush might not touch him because of the hall-wall. He saw firelight, a clear blaze shine bright.

Then the good man saw the accurate dwelling in the deep, the mighty merewoman. He gave a great thrust to his sword—his hand did not withhold the stroke—so that the etched blade sang at her head a fierce war-song. Then the stranger found that the battle-lightning would not bite, harm her life, but the edge failed the prince in his need; many a hand-battle had it endured before; often shored helmet, war-cloth of man failed to die: this was the first time for the rare treasure that its glory had failed.

But still he was resolute, not slow of his courage, mindful of fame, the kinsman of Hygelac. Then, angry warrior, he threw away the sword, wavy-patterned, bound with ornaments, so that it lay on the ground, hard and steel-edged: he tossed in his strength, his might hand-grasp. So sought a man to do when he thinks to get long-lasting praise in battle: he cares not for his life. Then he seized by the hair Grendel’s mother—the man of the War-Geats did not shrink from the fight. Battle-hardened, now swollen with rage, he pulled his deadly foe so that she fell to the floor. Quickly in her turn she repaid him: his gift with her grim claws and clutched at him: weary-hearted, the strongest of warriors, of foot soldiers, stumbled so that he fell. Then she sat upon the half-bigast drew her knife, broad and bright-edged. She would avenge her child her only son. The woven breast-armor by his shoulders that protected his life, withstood entry of point or of edge. Then the son of Ecgflaf would have fared amiss under the wide ground, the champion of the Geats, if the battle-shirt had not brought help, the hard war-net—and holy God brought about victory in war; the wise Lord, Ruler of the Heavens, decided it with might, easily, when Beowulf had stood up again.

(XXXII.) Then he saw among the armor a victory-blessed blade, an iron sword made by the giants, strong of its edges, glory of warriors: it was the best of weapons, except that it was fain to war-craft, good and adorned, the work of giants. He seized the licker hilt, he who fought for the Scyldings, savage and slaughter-bent, drew the patterned blade; desperate of life, he struck angrily so that it bit her hand against the neck, broke the bane-rings. The blade went through all the doomed body. She fell to the floor, the sword was sweating, the man rejoiced in his work.

The blaze brightness, light stone within, just as from the sky heav-en’s candle shines: clear. He looked about the building: then he moved along the wall, raised his weapon hard by the hilt. Hygelac’s thane, angry and resolve: the edge was not useless to the warrior, for he would quickly repay Grendel for the many attacks he had made on the West.
Danes—many more than the one time when he slew in their sleep fifteen hearth-companions of Hrothgar, devoured men of the Danish people while they slept, and another such number bore away, a hateful prey. He had paid him for that, the fierce champion, for there he saw Grendel, weary of war, lying there, lifeless with the wound he had got in the fight at Hroth. The body bound wide when it fell to the floor after death, the hard sword-wings and thus he cut off his head.

Once the wise men who were watching the water with Hrothgar saw that the surging waves were troubled, the lake stained with blood. Gray-haired, old, they spoke together of the good warrior, that they did not again expect of the chief that he would come victorious to seek their great King, for many agreed on it, that the sea-wolf had destroyed him.

Then came the ninth hour of the day. The brave Scyldings left the hall. The gold-friend of warriors went back to his home. The strangers sat sick at heart and stared at the mere. They wished—and did not expect—that they would see their beloved lord himself.

Then the blade began to waste away from the battle-wound, the war-sword into battle-icicles. That was a wondrous thing, that it should all melt, most like the ice when the Father loosens the frost's fetters,undoesthe water-bonds—He Who has power over seasons and times. He is the true Ruler, Beowulf did not take from the dwelling of the man of the Weather-Gaerts, more treasures—though he saw many there—least of all the head and the hill, bright with jewels. The sword itself had already melted, its patterned blade burned away the blood was too hot for it; the spirit that had there died too poisonous. Quickly he was swimming, he who had lived to see the fall of his foes; he plunged up through the water.

The currents were all cleansed, the great tracts of the water, when the dire spirit left her life-days and this loaved world.

Then the protector of seafarers came toward the land, swimming stout-hearted; he had joy of his sea-boauty, the great burden he had had with him. They went to meet him, thanked God, the strong band of thanes, rejoiced in their chief that they might see him again sound. Then the helmet and war-shirt of the mighty one were quickly loosened. The lake drowsed, the water beneath the skies, stained with blood. They went forth on the foot-tracks, glad in their hearts, measured the path back, the known ways, men bold as kings. They bore the head from the mere's cliff, toilously for each of the great-hearted ones: four of them had trouble in carrying Grendel's head on spear-shafts to the gold-hall—until at last they came striding to the hall, fourteen bold warriors of the Geats; their lord, high-spirited, walked in their company over the fields to the mead-hall.

Then the chief of the thanes, man daring in deeds, enriched by new glory, warrior dear to battle, came in to greet Hrothgar. Then Grendel's head was dragged by the hair over to the floor where men drank, a terrible thing to the ears and the woman with them, an awful sight: the men looked upon it.

[Further Celebration at Heorot]

(XXIV). Beowulf spoke, the son of Ecgtheow: "Yes, we have brought you this sea-booty, son of Hælfdene, man of the Scyldings, gladly, as evidence of glory—what you look on here. Not easily did I come through it with my life, the war under water, not without trouble carried out the task. The fight would have been ended straightway if God had not guarded me. With hunting I might not do anything in this fight, though that is a good weapon. But the wielder of Men gave me that I should see hanging on the wall a fair, ancient great-sword—most often He has guided the man without friends—that I should wield the weapon. Then in the fight when the time became right for me I hewed the house-guards. Then that war-sword, wavy-patterned, burned away as their blood sprang forth, hottest of battle-sweats. I have brought the hilt away from the foes. I have avenged the evil deeds, the slaughter of Danes, as it was right to do. I promise you that you may sleep in Heorot without care with your band of retainers, and that for none of the thanes of your people, old or young, need you have fear, prince of the Scyldings—for no life-injury to your men on that account, as you did before."

Then the golden hilt was given into the hand of the old man, the hoary war-chief—the ancient work of giants. There came into the possession of the prince of the Danes, after the fall of giants, the work of wonder-smiths. And when the hostile-heated creature, God's enemy, guilty of murder, gave up this world, and his mother too, it passed into the control of the best of worldly kings between the seas, of those who gave treasure in the Northlands.

Hrothgar spoke—he looked on the hilt, the old heirloom, on which was written the origin of ancient strife, when the flood, rushing water, slew the race of giants—they suffered terribly: that was a people alien to the Everlasting Lord. The Ruler made them a last payment through waters welling. On the sword-guard of bright gold there was also rightly marked through rime-staves, set down and told, for whom that sword was made, that first had been made, its hilt twisted and ornamented with snakes. Then the wise man spoke, the son of Hælfdene—all were silent:

"Lo, this may one say who works truth and right for the folk, recalls all things far distant, an old guardian of the land: this earl was born the better man. Glory is raised up over the far ways—your glory over every people, Beowulf my friend. All of it, all your strength, you govern steadily in the wisdom of your heart. I shall fulfill my friendship to you, just as