Visualization can improve real industrial projects.

This method for visualizing the scoping process in platform-based development of embedded systems shows the decision process of including or excluding features that are candidates for the next release.

Charts are evaluated in a large-size embedded system platform project and indicates that the visualization of feature survival and scope dynamics can improve the understanding of the decision process of platform scoping in real industrial projects.

Future work includes improving user interaction.